Based upon a survey conducted by JETRO last September, a total of 1,724 Japanese affiliated factories are operating throughout all of the fifty states except North Dakota. By generating a little more than 400,000 jobs and 294 jobs per factory, it is clear that these Japanese companies make a definite contribution to U.S. employment.

The survey also revealed that more than 50 percent of the respondents currently suffer a deficit. However, more than 60 percent of them are expecting an upturn in profits.

These Japanese manufacturing companies represent a powerful 1.9 billion dollar contribution to U.S. export figures. Among these manufacturers, 66 % have experience in exporting their U.S.-manufactured products. This figure continues to increase. In 1990, 58% and 1991, 62% of the companies exported their U.S. made items. Currently, 41% are exporting to Japan.

Survey responses also indicated the amount of local content used in the manufacturing process continues to increase. A total of 64% of the plants used more than 70% of America-made components and/or materials. This is in comparison to 1990 when 58% and 1991 when 62% of the plants predominately used American parts or materials.
